Profound Shift

Psychology has undergone a profound shift over the last 50 years. In 1960, women received only a small minority of doctorates in the field. Today, in many parts of the world, women receive the majority. To understand this shift and the role women and feminists have played in it, we need to collect the first-hand accounts of feminist psychologists who were instrumental in bringing about these changes and those who continue to enrich psychology with feminism. We also need to be aware of our history. Who were the women who came before us? How did their work lay the foundation for feminist psychology? This site highlights important women in psychology's past and amplifies the diverse voices of contemporary feminist psychologists. We invite you to explore their stories.

Rose Butler Browne was born in Boston, Massachusetts on March 19, 1897. She was the daughter of John R. Butler, a brickmason and Hannah F. McClenney, who worked at a laundry. She was also a great granddaughter of a former slave and her maternal greatgrandmother, Charlotte Ann Elizabeth Lindsey, traced her ancestry to the Native American Indians. Browne referred to her as "High

Why PFV is our activism

Read their stories, hear their voices

- It allows us to countervail the "violence of the archive" archives produced within the conditions of patriarchy, heterosexism, and racism that have privileged – and reinforce the privilege of certain kinds of people and experience by limiting, erasing, and distorting what it is possible to know about the past
- PFV allows us to present immediate access to voices and bodies and affects that express feminism in different ways
- PFV allows us to create and curate feminist expressions of intersectionality, methods, mental health you name it!
- PFV allows us to perform our feminisms through social media, dramatic performances, film screenings
- PFV allows us to CREATE, COLLECT, DOCUMENT, RECORD, PRESERVE, CURATE, PROMOTE, ADVOCATE, PERFORM

4: STORAGE & TIME

Archives require spaces in which to be stored (physical or digital). Many physical archives end up in a basement due to an assumption that archives are containing histories, and therefore should be separate from the contemporary activities taking place "above". There is also the practicality of temperature and size. Digital preservationists are finding challenges with both space and formats with an ever changing and increasing content. Time is the archivist's enemy: a race to preserve and conserve before deterioration or loss.
